There is no process for official registration of such ISO certifying agency. However, some departments of the Government of India promote the industry to follow the international standards like ISO 9000 and ISO 14001 by providing a token assistance. Such departments like DGFT and small scale industries sometimes publish the list of the certification bodies.

(c) Some of the agencies like DGFT has laid down the criteria for recognition which is given in paragraph 2.59.2 of Handbook of Procedure (Vol. 1) 1st April, 2002- 31st March, 2007 (as amended upto 31.3.2003).

(d) There is no specific number of certification bodies available as there is no system of registration. However, the number of certification bodies in 1993 was approx. below 10 and as of now in 2003, there would be around 40 operating in India.

(e) Some of the certifying agency who are accredited directly by an accreditation council in India are only being audited directly by their respective accreditation council regularly.

(f) The accredited certificates that are being issued by the certification bodies are considered equivalent internationally, if the accreditation body is signatory to Multilateral Arrangement (MLA) of mutual recognition. In the event of the certification body not being accredited or being accredited by an accreditation body which is not a MLA signatory, the authenticity of the certificates is doubtful.
